

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

PREFACE.

PREFACE.

THE first two accounts in this volume do not emanate from the office of the Lord High Treasurer: they are given up by David Beaton, Bishop of St. Andrews, recently elevated to the Cardinalate, and relate, along with the last account in the preceding volume, to the expenses incurred by the King when in France wooing his first wife, to the moneys received as dowries for Queen Magdalene and Queen Mary, and to sundry payments for articles bought in France and sent home to Scotland. The first of the Treasurer proper is that of Sir James Kirkcaldy of Grange and is in direct continuation of the penultimate account in the last volume, covering the period from 29th September 1538 to 17th September of the following year. The next account is from the last-mentioned date to 7th September 1540, and the last is in continuation of it and closes on 7th September 1541, a year and three months before the death of the King. These accounts are all given up by Kirkcaldy, and it will be seen that there are only three accounts of the Treasurer in the volume—a much less number than usual—and that in consequence they are of considerable length and go much into detail. While not perhaps of so great historical interest as their predecessors, they throw a strong light on the social conditions of the period and on the constitution and cost of the household of the Sovereign.

THE FRENCH ACCOUNTS.

Of what may be called the three French accounts the first was given at the conclusion of the last volume, but it may be more appropriately noticed in connection with the other two. It was given up by the Treasurer and covers a period from 11th September 1536, that is from the date of the landing of the King in France, to 22nd September 1538, three months after the arrival of Mary of Lorraine in Scotland. It deals with the receipts and expenses "extra suum officium thesaurariatus tam in regno Francie quam in regno Scotie." The total of the money received by the Treasurer amounts to £21,283 19s. 8d., and the details of the expenditure of this sum are carefully given and present many features of interest. The crews of the three ships, the Mary Willoughby, the Morisat, and the Salamander, including sailors, gunners, and others, amounted to six score and eight persons, that is one hundred and twenty-eight: these were divided into messes of four, and each man received four sous a day, which does not seem an extravagant wage. There were

32 sailors on the Mary Willoughby, 21 on the Morisat, and the same number on Thomas Richartson's ship, which was probably the Salamander. The first-named ship got new sails on her arrival in France at a cost of 78 francs, and both she and the Morisat got chain cables weighing 2723 lbs. and other outfit of new masts, &c.¹ The Salamander seems to have taken Lord Erskine and Lord Rothes back to Scotland in October:² and the Morisat took others of the King's suite there in November.³ The Mary Willoughby probably lay at Dieppe during the winter, but in spring she went round to Bordeaux to bring back wines for the King's use.⁴ Both the other ships must have returned from Scotland, as the Morisat got sails on 25th March 1537, and the Salamander, with a new mast, came round from Umflew (Honfleur) to Dieppe the end of that month.⁵

Most of the expenses in this account are concerned with outlays for clothing for the King, liveries for his servants, and caparisons for his horses. Much of the stuff bought, however, was not made up, and may have been reserved for future use when he got home. One of his largest purchases was five "tymmir" of "martrik sable," that is to say two hundred skins of martens, for which he paid 1620 francs. The "broudstar," or embroiderer got for his work on the King's wardrobe 450 francs, and in addition to all the items which are mentioned in detail there is a general entry of a sum paid to Robert Russy, a banker, "for furnessing of goods," amounting to 1125 francs. The King's horse caparisons must have been very imposing. Ten ells of crimson velvet for a caparison and a "jornay" or small sleeveless tunic to be worn over armour cost 140 francs. Seventy-two ells of green, white, and incarnate velvet were furnished for six "jorneys" and caparisons at a cost of 468 francs. Twenty-two ells of yellow velvet, seventeen ells of red velvet, and fifteen ells of gray velvet were purchased for pages' liveries, the ordinary red and yellow of the Scots Royal household having some addition of gray.

Various payments are made to the members of the King's retinue, but whether these cover the time of their whole stay in France is not clear. Thomas Lioun, the "baxstar," gets two payments of 45s. each; Anthony, a player on the tabor, gets £13 10s., which seems to indicate that his professional skill was highly rated. A mysterious being with the soubriquet of "Fle be the sky" gets the small payment of 12s.; while the master cook got 13s. a day for himself and his horse. John Bog, who seems to have managed the stable department, got 8s. a day. The cost of a horse's keep was five sous per day, as appears from an entry for the expenses of a white hackney of the King; the expense of hiring a horse and the entertainment of its rider and itself on the road only came to sixteen sous a day, as is shown by an entry relating to a ride of eight days to Compiègne by Alexander Con and Thomas Richartson.

Before starting for Scotland again the ships were provisioned and furnished with much new gear and some artillery. The beef and mutton provided for the voyage cost nearly 500 francs; flour was got for the baker, and biscuits at a cost of 127 francs. Light bread, bacon, fish, and beer were also included in the provisions. No less than 225 francs was paid for "streamers" or flags for the King's ships—a large sum—though it includes the expenses of George Home and Captain Lundy riding to Rouen to make the purchase.

The second of the accounts above referred to was rendered by David Beaton, the Cardinal, on 12th September 1538, and contained further receipts and expenses in connection with the French visits and the King's marriages. He first credits himself with the receipt of the dowries of the two Queen's: on 4th January 1436-7 he had received from Francis 100,000 francs as part payment of Magdalene's dowry, which was to have been as many ecus of gold: of this it had been arranged that 100,000 livres were to be paid on the day of the marriage and the remainder was to be received by way of bounty from certain of the Royal domains. There is another sum of 8333 francs received from the rents of the duchy of Guienne for one year from 1st January 1536-7, which probably completes all the money ever received by James on account of his first wife. On 4th May 1538 Beaton received another 100,000 francs in complete payment of the dowry of Marie of Lorraine, but out of these sums the Cardinal provided large amounts for the purchase of all kinds of expensive dresses and ornaments for James himself and also for presents for other people. No less than 3110 crowns, or about £2177 Scots, were spent in the purchase of cloth of gold, some of it worked plain and other pieces being upon violet and "incarnat" silk. It is impossible to go into the details of all the clothing bought by the King in France, but the temptation to give himself a real good outfit, purchased at the centre of fashion, seems to have been irresistible. A few items may, however, be given as specimens. A gown and doublet of crimson satin bought at Blois cost nearly 100 francs, and a "hugtoun" of crimson velvet bought at the same time cost 122 francs. All this was exclusive of the linings and making up. Furs were purchased to the extent of 520 crowns, or about £364; 1320 francs worth of gold and silver thread was given to the "browdstaris," and their bill for work done came to 675 francs. The King had a bed the hangings of which, made of green Genoa velvet, cost 233 francs, and the coverings of green Florentine damask nearly 100 francs: in addition to these there were other curtains of green Genoa taffety costing 108 francs: this did not include the making or the further adornment of the bed. Its gold embroidery cost 162 francs, and there were further expenses for sheets, bolsters, mattresses, &c. Lastly, 54 francs were spent on two great cowhides and two trunks to pack the bed and bedding in for conveyance home.¹

New Year's gifts and tips ran away with a lot of James's funds: he was very generous. To the Dauphin and the Duke of Orleans, his brother, he gave two beautiful "whingers" or swords garnished with gold and pearls: these with another which he gave to the King of Navarre cost in all 816 crowns. To the wife of the Dauphin, Catherine de Medici, he gave two bracelets set with eighteen fine rubies: he bought also 1000 crowns worth of pearls of the Orient to the number of 125, and he got an emerald for himself costing 150 crowns and a target of gold set with a ruby for his bonnet for 405 crowns. His bonnets were indeed splendid: forty diamonds were put in another, half of which he bought, set in a cross which cost 340 crowns: the other twenty he had in a cross of his own which he broke up. The Queen of Navarre got as her New Year gift a "coffer." A coffer might mean anything from a packing-case to a jewel-box: this was evidently more of the latter than the former, as it cost 360 crowns. The Queen's "spousing ring" (whether this implies the ring with which she was married or the engagement ring is not quite clear) had "ane grete diamand sett in table" costing 1100 crowns¹; the setting of this alone cost 22 francs.² The King bought another diamond ring for himself at Compiègne, but it only cost 130 crowns.³ Besides these purchases, a great deal of money was spent on gratuities to various persons. The officers of the household of the King of France got 440 crowns; the master of the household specially attached to James received 300 crowns to himself. Numerous other presents of money were given—to the King of France's porters and ushers, to his hautboys, "sisteis," and cornets; to musicians of the Queen of France, the Queen of Navarre, and the Duc de Guise; to "varlets" and other persons who rendered or claimed to render services to the King. Not the least curious item is a payment of 181 crowns for feathers used at the King's entry to Paris and at tournaments. It is interesting to be told that the marriage contract with Madeline was drawn up by M. Buchel, Francis's secretary, and that he got

200 crowns for his trouble. As Pope Julius II. had presented a sword and hat to James's father, so the Pope of his time, Paul III., appears to have sent him a similar present, which reached him when he was at Compiègne. The Papal envoy who brought the presents received a gift of 400 crowns, a horse, and a harnessing of velvet.¹

As the account proceeds there are indications of preparations for the home-going of the King and Queen.

Some furs which had been bought at Amboise and altered at Rouen cost 480 crowns: furs were a most expensive item in the dress of the period. The lodgings of the Royal pair in Rouen cost 20 crowns, and a like sum was given away in alms in that town. One hundred crowns were spent there in the purchase of "small things" for the Queen, and another hundred were laid out at a place called Montebelger for "necessaries" for the Queen. After some further purchases they arrived at Dieppe, where the French "little allokayis," Bonaveil, the King of France's footman, and sundry officers of the household were all duly tipped. The party had their washing done before the voyage, the laundress getting eight crowns. Just before starting a man was sent through "the pass of Calais" to "vesie the Inglis schoir," that is to see if no English ships were ready to dispute their passage. At last they got off, and some incidents of the voyage are chronicled. Twice at least the travellers stopped in order to send on shore for fresh meat, one of these occasions being at Tynemouth. Off Bamborough, on 15th May, they bought some fish from local fishing boats, and off Eyemouth a similar purchase was made. At last the Port of Leith was made in safety, and at the disembarkation sundry gifts were made. The Vice-Admiral of Leith and the French Ambassador, who is called Monsieur Elimosins, each got a silver-gilt cup containing 400 crowns—a very handsome gift. The commanders of the vessels were not of course forgotten. Captain Marmoling, as the presumably French name is spelt by the Scottish scribe, and Captain John Borthwick got 100 crowns apiece: Captain Michel got 50 crowns, and the master of the King's ship, who is expressly said to have been a Frenchman though he bore the singularly home-like name of John Scot, got 20 crowns. We get incidentally the name of one of the French ships which had accompanied the squadron to Scotland; it was called the Perforce.

After narrating the money disbursed at the home-coming, the account again takes up the particular accounts of various persons for services rendered and articles bought in France. Passing over a tailor's bill which calls for no special notice, we come to some interesting entries relating to the purchase of tapestry in Paris. There were six pieces, measuring altogether 147 ells: they contained the "story of the triumphant dames," and cost 883 francs. The next account which claims special attention is one of Hoitman, a goldsmith. He charged 6562 francs for three cups of gold given respectively to Francis, the French Queen, and the Great Master of France. The King's was the most valuable, as it weighed 16 merks, the price of the merk weight being 168 francs. The Queen's was 12 merks 5 ounces, and the Master's 10 merks 3 ounces. This was for the material alone: he charged for the workmanship 50 crowns apiece, or in all 337 francs: but the goldsmith got from James two chains of gold of the value of 3905 francs, so that their cost was proportionally reduced.

The same goldsmith also had a large bill for plate. He provided much silver plate for the table, consisting of dishes, plates, chandeliers, &c., to the amount of 5188 francs, and silver-gilt articles, among which may be mentioned "ane gret schep for the pantre," weighing 34 merks, or 272 ounces, the price of the merk being 18 francs, at the cost of 3607 francs. He also repaired and gilt some other plate and engraved arms on it, for which he got 377 francs. The whole of Hoitman's account for plate and some other sundries came to 9359 francs, but against this had to be put a quantity of old plate which he had taken in exchange to the value of 1931 francs. James was not done with Hoitman yet. Just before leaving

France, when he was in Dieppe, another account came in for plate of nearly 2000 francs, and in addition to this there was a quantity of silver work for his chapel, consisting of candlesticks, a cross, a holy-water dish, a chalice, &c., costing in all 1033 francs. It is probable, too, that Hoitman furnished the very formidable list of "buttonis, peirlis, and hornis" which figure in the accounts. The buttons were chiefly gold: the "pearls," which were some sort of embroidery, cost 180 francs a thousand; but the great pearl with which the sword presented to the Duke of Orleans was adorned cost 18 francs by itself. Small accounts for jewellery occur from time to time in this account; the last one is for two gold chains—one small one, costing 100 crowns, from which was hung the King of France's Order (probably the St. Michael) garnished with diamonds, rubies, and pearls: another and cheaper one was enamelled with black, and to this also was suspended another Order.¹

Many other interesting items will be found in the account under discussion, but it is impossible to go much further into detail. It may be mentioned, however, that two tuns of white wine containing eight puncheons cost 300 francs. This wine was not that brought in the King's ship direct from Bordeaux, but was bought in Rouen and shipped from there to Dieppe.² It only remains to note that the portorage of all the King's gear to Dieppe cost 87 francs—a very moderate sum—but it is probable that the cartage required was impressed from the unfortunate owners of the carts, as there is an entry of the expenses incurred in causing carts to be “arrested” by the King's lieutenant in Rouen.¹

The third of the French accounts is also rendered by Beaton and nominally covers the period from 12th September 1538 to 7th December 1539, but it is evident that some of the entries at least refer to a previous date and are concerned with articles got in connection with the King's first nuptials. The account commences with a statement of the moneys received, and we learn that the sources from which the money came were, in the first place, the annuity of 20,000 francs which Francis had agreed to pay on his son-in-law's marriage with Marie, and next, the sum of 12,000 francs received from the rents of the duchy of Guienne, as before mentioned. The expenses contained in the account divide themselves into three parts. The first deals mainly, but not altogether, with articles bought in France. There are dresses, swords, spears, feathers, and the carriage of all these to Scotland; 450 francs are set down as having been given as a loan to the Queen in Rouen: this was done by a precept under the King's signet, dated 1st December, in the twenty-seventh year of his reign, which would be 1539, so that this loan must refer to Queen Marie. Some large purchases were made at this time: 767 francs were paid for a "great pointed diamond" for the King, and another smaller one was bought for 270 francs. One hundred tons of wine, with olive oil and verjuice, cost 3712 francs. Artillery and munitions of war were purchased to the extent of 7700 francs, and certain tapestry cost 1125 francs. This portion of the Accounts is signed by Kirkcaldy, the Treasurer, and a quorum of the auditors.

The next part of this account begins with a list of the amount of cloth of gold, silk, and velvet previously purchased, the sums paid for these being entered in the account already considered, that is, the second of these French accounts. Beaton here simply charges himself with the receipt of so many ells irrespective of the price, which is unnecessary to be given. Then follows a list of the persons to whom all this stuff was given. The King himself, of course, got a large proportion of the cloth of gold: he had two gowns and a coat made of this rich stuff; "Madame Magdalen," as she is called, got some; the wife of the Dauphin got a gown of the same material; "Madame Margaret," Madeline's sister, got seven ells of "Paris mett," probably an inferior quality to the "Lyons mett" which the King had; and Made-moiselle de Pontevoir got two ells of the same.

“Madamemosal de Wandom,” the Duke of Vendôme’s deformed daughter, was not forgotten, and received eight and a half ells of cloth of gold. The crimson velvet was chiefly given in pieces of ten ells each to the ladies of the Queen’s suite, whose names are all given in a more or less mangled fashion by the Scottish scribe. The black velvet and the crimson and black satin were mainly bestowed upon persons of less rank, Queen Magdalene’s nurse getting twenty ells of the last-mentioned stuff.

The third and last part of this account is composed of items of which the expense was defrayed from the dower received by the King with his second wife and from the rents of the Duchy of Guienne. Some of the more interesting entries may be briefly mentioned. The Papal dispensation for the marriage of James and Marie, which had to be got, was sent for by post, and the expenses of sending for it and getting it from Rome amounted to 200 crowns: this does not probably include the fees which were no doubt payable to the officers at the Vatican. For the drawing up of the King’s marriage contract with Marie, Buchel, King Francis’s secretary, and other secretaries got 150 crowns—a considerably less sum than was paid to the same official for the previous contract. Indeed, everything connected with the second marriage seems to have been on a scale of much-reduced expenditure. Queen

Marie's "spousing ring," though it was set with a diamond, only cost 300 crowns, while Queen Madeline's had cost 1100 for the diamond alone. The marriage by proxy, at which Lord Maxwell officiated on behalf of James, is generally said to have taken place at Paris, but there is an entry of a payment of 40 crowns to the officers and minstrels "the day of the Queen's marriage at Chasteau Dun."¹ Chateau Dun is still to be seen, an imposing pile on the pointed cliffs above the Loire about twenty-six miles to the south of Chartres. As before, opportunity was taken of the Queen's passage to Scotland to import a lot of wine for the Royal cellars, and 18½ tuns of "quhit and claret land wyne" were purchased at a cost of 379 francs. As before, too, the cost of England was carefully reconnoitred before the Queen was allowed to start on her voyage. She came with three galleys, one of them, whether by chance or design, being commanded by the same Captain Marmoling or Mormulling who brought her predecessor to the Scottish shores. His boat was the Riall, possibly the galley mentioned in the last account as being called Monsieur de Roy.² This time he received a gratuity of 200 crowns instead of 100, which he had before, his chief officer in the same ship getting 100 crowns, while the captains of the other two vessels got 50 crowns apiece. Madame de Montrule, who had come to Scotland with Queen Madeline, now took her departure and got a gift of 200 crowns. "The auld Quenis nureis" probably went also, as she got 40 crowns, and Madeline seems to have come north provided for all possible contingencies, as there is an entry of a gift of 20 crowns to "the ald Quenis meidwiffe."¹

It is rather curious to find that on the 29th June 1539 a present of 200 crowns was given to the "Kingis grace derrest mother." This seems to point to the fact that she was in some need of money, and it is certain that she had been complaining of the extravagance of her third husband, Lord Methven, and had even gone so far as to institute proceedings for a divorce. The only other gratuity contained in this account which need be mentioned is one of 2000 crowns to Beaton himself, who seems to have gone personally to France to attend Queen Marie and make arrangements for her journey to Scotland. The sum was only "in part of recompensatioun of his expensis," and no doubt the Cardinal had paid a good deal of money out of his own pocket during the journey. The last entries in the account testify to the fact of 34,450 crowns being put in the King's boxes in presence of witnesses.

¹P. 61.

THE TREASURER'S ACCOUNTS.

The first account of the Treasurer is for the year from September 1538 to September 1539. This together with the other accounts in the volume deals with the expenses month by month. At the end of the account is a separate summary of the expenses incurred upon the munitions, artillery, and certain buildings in the Castle of Edinburgh for the accommodation of the same. A large proportion of the account is taken up with details of dresses for the King, Queen, and other members of the family, together with liveries for the household. As regards the latter, it has not been considered necessary to give the various items of clothing in detail, though the names of the persons receiving liveries are all mentioned: indeed in many cases in the accounts themselves various classes of servants are grouped together, and it would appear that these got a sum of money in lieu of actual clothing.

The most interesting items are those to be found under the heading of money disbursed by special precepts of the King, that is to say those which did not fall under the expenditure upon the wardrobe, stable, fees to messengers, and carriage of goods. In September an envoy arrived from the English King in search of a ship which had been taken by pirates. He not only got £30 for himself but a pursuivant was at once sent with letters to all the seaports north of the Forth and Tay and all along the north coast to seek for the pirates and to make certain that they were not being "resetted" anywhere. Sir James Hamilton got £180 for repairs on the Palace of Linlithgow and Blackness Castle : the former seems to have been undergoing pretty extensive alteration at this time, as in the last of the French accounts dealt with above there is an entry of 400 crowns for the same work. We learn also that a proclamation was sent to the south of Scotland ordaining the lieges to plant wood. This was probably the result of an Act of Parliament of 1535, which provided that previous Acts for the encouragement of planting were to be put to "sharp execution," and that every man having £100 yearly of new extent where there are no woods or forests should expend so much as would plant wood and make hedges and haining for three acres of land, and that landowners should cause their tenants to plant one tree yearly for every merk-land.¹

The gifts for the first New Year's Day that Queen Marie spent in Scotland appear to have been more costly than usual. Thomas Rynd, the goldsmith, got no less than £240 for gold rings, chains, and "tablets," and other gold ornaments for the King to give away: another goldsmith, John Kyle, was paid £23 for two hearts of gold and chains, while John Mossman, whom we have frequently met before in these Accounts, also made chains, rings, &c., to the value of £63, and in addition manufactured a large basin of gold weighing upwards of 10 lbs., besides a ship of gold probably for table decoration. For these he was paid £74 in money and received two bracelets to melt down and incorporate with the other articles wanted.¹

The Scottish Parliament passed many Acts in connection with the salmon fishings throughout the country: heavy penalties were enforced against the slayers of "reid fische" in close time, which was provided by an Act of 1424 to be from the Feast of the Assumption to that of St. Andrew (15th August to 30th November) in each year. Notwithstanding all the pains and penalties which were incurred, illegal fishing must have been very frequent, and no doubt it was difficult to bring delinquents to book. There are in this volume frequent payments to messengers for going down to all parts of the country with summonses against such offenders;² but with the success of their mission these Accounts, of course, are not concerned. No doubt the fish were a valuable asset in the victualling of the people: they cost nothing to feed or to keep at a time when all kinds of stock were at a fairly high price for the times. A curious entry on May 1539 indicates the value of cattle at that period : two poor women who had in some way lost two cows "the tyme that the man was byrnt in Cowpar" were given 40s. and 50s. respectively for their beasts.

What this burning in Cupar was is not specifically mentioned. Several persons had already suffered for the new faith. MacKeillor, Forret, the Vicar of Dollar, and others had been executed at Edinburgh, 31st February 1538-9, and Kennedy and Russel suffered the same fate in Glasgow the same year : but history does not chronicle this Cupar burning.

THE ROYAL HOUSEHOLD.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of the Accounts contained in the present volume is the information which they incidentally give as to the composition of the Household of the Scottish Sovereign during the period dealt with. No doubt there is a certain amount of detail on the subject to be met with in previous volumes, but nowhere are the individual members of the King's entourage alluded to so fully and with so much circumstantiality as in the present Accounts. Not long ago a valuable contribution to our knowledge of the constitution of the Royal Household in Scotland was made by Miss Bateson in her transcription of a MS. in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, dealing with the principal officers of the Household in Scotland at the beginning of the fourteenth century.¹ Several of the officers there mentioned, such as the Chancellor, Chamberlain, and Constable, had gradually become either officers of State or, at all events, persons whose duties extended over a much wider sphere than the mere supervision of the domestic affairs of the Sovereign.

The Steward, at one time a high officer of the Household, only being accountable to the Chamberlain, was apparently, in the Household of James V., only ranked with several other officers of inferior degree. James's Steward of the Household was Sir David Christison, and he got for his "liveray claithis" the sum of £13 6s. 6d. per annum. The Almoner, according to the Cambridge MS., had the superintendence of all the King's hospitals, where "the servants of the King's Household who grow old and his poor bondsmen who cannot help themselves" were to be received and supported. There is no trace, however, of such establishments in the present Accounts, and the Almoner's duties were confined to disbursing the King's alms to his bedesmen at Eastertide, and, as has been seen in previous volumes, in providing gratuities to the religious houses in the various places which the King visited in the course of his journeyings. The Almoner seems always to have been an ecclesiastic, and in the present Accounts Sir George Clapperton held the office, receiving for his livery the same sum as the Steward.¹ In early times he had "a clerk assigned under him on the Kings behalf to guard the almonry," and now the Almoner's assistant is styled "elemosinars priest": as such Sir John Jordan received the same amount as the others for his livery. The offices of Clerk of the Liverance and Clerk of the Provender mentioned in the Cambridge MS. appear to have been united in the later Kings' households in the person of a Clerk of Expense, who acted under the Masters of the Household, and was a person of considerable standing in the establishment, as he received £20 for his livery. John Bellenden, the translator of Livy, held this office at one time. The Clerk of the Wardrobe of the fourteenth century had developed by the sixteenth into Master of the Wardrobe. He had the care of all the wearing apparel of the King and of all vestments, robes, jewels, &c. Thomas Arthur, the Master of the Wardrobe to James V., figures largely in the present Accounts: it is rather curious that there is no entry of livery or other payment to him, but he was a person of distinction in the Household and a trusted servant of the King. He had a servant of his own of the name of Robert Craig, besides a yeoman of the wardrobe, who got £13 6s. 8d. annually, and two grooms of the wardrobe, who got £10.² Under the Master of the Wardrobe was the tailor, Malcolm

¹P. 125.| ²P. 126.

Gourlay, and the sempstress, Kate Bellenden, who had probably assistants under her. The ushers are the only other household officers who are mentioned in the Cambridge MS., and who also occur in these Accounts. Among these may be mentioned the Usher of the Inner Chamber door : he is styled the laird of Cragy, and was John Ross of Cragy, in the county of Perth : in a charter to him in September 1533 he is called "primus hostiariorum regis," which shows that the custody of the Inner or Presence Chamber bestowed a superior rank on its holder. There were two ushers of the outer chamber door, and an usher of the hall door, who, as he is also termed "colyer," may have had the superintendence of firing the Palace.

But the heads and responsible officers of all the domestic arrangements in the Palace in the time of King James V. were the two Masters of the Household. Why the office should have been divided and what were the exact duties apportioned to each is not discoverable from the Accounts, but its holders, James Learmonth of Dairsie and Patrick Wemyss of Pittencrieff, were officers of the first rank. They, and they only, had a "levy" amounting to £50 each, more than double what any other member of the Household received. David Wood, at whose house of Crag in Forfarshire the King frequently stayed, was Comptroller of the Accounts, and he had a clerk in the person of George Ogilvy. There was an "abbreviatour of the bukis" in the person of Sir George Scot, a cleric who is also styled Clerk of Expenses.

The lesser officers, especially those who were in personal attendance on the King, were persons of good family, to whom a position at Court, in whatever capacity, held out prospects of advancement to themselves and their families. Oliver Sinclair of Pitcairn, the King's favourite, afterwards to be the ill-fated commander at the rout of Solway Moss, was one of the two cup-bearers, the other being Henry Kemp of Thomastoun. The two "sewaris" or servitors to the King were John Leslie of Cleish and the Comptroller. The King had also in attendance four yeomen of the chamber—Patrick Kirkcaldy, a brother of the laird of Grange; Norman Leslie, the master of Rothes; John Guthrie, who is described in a charter as "in Colistoun" and who got a grant of lands near Brechin from the King in 1541; and James Watson, who is described as a surgeon in a grant of lands in the barony of Longforgund, which he got from the King in March 1539–40. He had succeeded John Murray, the King's gossip and barber, from which may be inferred that, though called "chirurgo" in the charter alluded to, he really followed the humbler occupation of a "barber-surgeon." The grooms of the chamber were ordinarily four in number, all scions of notable houses. Alexander Kemp was probably a relative of the cup-bearer; Alexander Whitelaw, Patrick Stirling, and Andrew Drummond bear names characteristic of good Scots families. In the account in which they occur there is an extra groom of the chamber mentioned, Murdo Mackenzie. He was a natural son of Roderick Mackenzie, probably a younger brother of John Mackenzie of Kintail, and received letters of legitimation under the Great Seal, 1st July 1539, and subsequently more than one grant of lands from the King.

Of the menial servants attending the King there is only mention of two lackeys and nine pages. None of these, it will be noticed, got grants of money for their "livery," but were given the actual dresses by the hands of the Court tailor, Malcolm Gourlay. The lackeys were clad in the King's ordinary colours, red and yellow—the "livery colours" taken from the red and gold on the Royal arms. The pages, on the other hand, seem to have been—at all events in 1538—in black with red bonnets¹ or grey hose.²

The heads of the various departments in the Palace were persons of importance in their own line. Thomas Marshal, the master cook, got £20 for his livery, being at the highest rate, with the exception of the Masters of the Household. He apparently had the oversight of the preparation of the meals for the King himself, as there was another master Court cook, who only got £13 6s. 8d., and was probably the head of the kitchen for the general Court. In the same rank was the master baker, the "katour" or caterer, who was a cleric of the name of Sir John M'Caw,¹ the poultryman, and the patisser or pastry-cook. In the kitchen also were two grooms of the King's kitchen and the same number of the Court kitchen: each of these departments had also an under-groom, getting £10 for livery, and two turnspits, who got £5 6s. 8d. There were two grooms to keep the dishes, getting £10, and three inferior men, who served the dishes and cleaned the hall, and who got £5. A groom of the kitchen door completed the number of servants in this particular branch of the Household. But other officers indirectly ministered to it: there was a pantryman, two yeomen of the bread-house, a yeoman and groom of the great larder, a yeoman of the petty larder, a yeoman and groom of the spice-house. For the silver there were a yeoman and a groom, and a groom only for the other vessels used. In the wine cellar there were two yeomen, a groom, and a bottleman, while the ale-cellar had one. Maus Achesoun or Atkinson, who had been a long time in the Royal service, superintended, as lavender or laundress, the washing of the establishment, and got for her "livery" £13 6s. 8d. What her staff consisted of is not stated.

The Court musicians came under a somewhat different category from the above. They not only had actual clothing assigned them, but the Accounts inform us as to the amount of the salaries or "pensions" which were bestowed on some of them. There were five Italian minstrels, probably singers, who got two liveries in the year each livery being valued at £6 10s. There were four "players upoun the veolis": one of them, probably the principal, had a livery of red entirely, with a "reid scarlet bonet"; the other three had the usual red and gold parti-colour livery of the household, with "reid bonatis": each of these got in addition a yearly pension of £40. There were also four "trumpettis of weir" and two "players on the Swesche taburn," who were clad in red and yellow, and who each got £20 a year. Then there was Anthony, the "taborar," an old and privileged retainer who had been about the Court since 1526 and who grumbled about wearing the usual red and yellow, and was only pacified by receiving a money payment of £9 17s. to provide clothes for himself with.¹

There were several persons who got grants of livery "extra-ordinary" and whose precise connection with the Court is not indicated. Grants of £20 were received by George Steill, "the laird of Colmeskeith" (John Hamilton), "the young laird of Grange in Angus," probably William

¹P. 119.

Durham, son and heir of Alexander Durham of Grange, and who is described in a charter of 1536 as "familiaris servitor regis"; the parson of Dysart, who was John Danielston or Denniston, described in charters as "familiaris servitor regis," Sir Michael Dysart, and Sir William Drummond, all perhaps Court chaplains; and the French apothecary.

The Queen had special attendants of her own, some of them French. Thus we read of a Monsieur Acquyr who returned to his native country in 1538: Monsieur Beglatt was her pantryman. She had a French master of the household and at least seven ladies in attendance on her, some of whom were French and some Scottish. Of the former Joanna Gresmoir or Gresoner married Robert Beaton of Creich, and the King gave her a dowry, £323 of which was paid in August 1540¹ The marriage, however, probably took place a good time earlier than that date, as she got a present of a very handsome gown of red velvet, costing £108, in May 1539, apparently for her wedding.² She had a large family by Beaton, and it is rather curious that her maiden name seems to have been forgotten very soon, because in two charters which she had in 1553 and 1563 she is called Joanna Delareynveill, which has been transmogrified into Renwall by subsequent genealogists,¹ but which of course simply means Joanna of the old or late Queen. She married after Beaton's death John Hay, Abbot of Balmerino.

¹P. 328.

Among other persons in the Queen's household may be noted an almoner, a female fool or jester of the name of Serat, who was clad in red and yellow with a kirtle of green satin, and a little French dwarf called Jane. The keeping of dwarfs was quite the rage at this period among ladies of rank. They not only kept them but bred them: two dwarfs at the Court of Mantua were married, and one of their children was offered by Isabella d'Este, the Marchioness of Mantua, to a friend as a gift, exactly in the same way as she would have offered a puppy of a prize strain of dogs.² On the other servants within the Palace there is not space to enlarge; but there were nurses, "rockers," and other attendants both on the Queen and several of the King's illegitimate children: the "Abbot of Kelso" and the "Prior of St. Andrews" were two very juvenile persons who had ecclesiastical titles, being both named James Stewart, the first being the King's son by Elizabeth Shaw, daughter of Shaw of Sauchie, and the other being his son by Margaret Erskine, and was afterwards better known as the Regent Moray. There are also many allusions to their half-sister, Jane, the daughter of the King and Elizabeth Beaton, and who was married in 1554 to Archibald, fifth Earl of Argyle.

Outside the actual Palace walls there was a large body of retainers. The stables were perhaps the largest extra-mural department. Its head does not seem to have been styled Master of the Horse but Squire of the King's Stable. The appointment was held by Robert Gib, who in previous Accounts was only designated "stirrup-man." He was probably identical with Robert Gib of Carriberis, who is described in many charters to him as "familiaris servitor regis." Under him were four yeomen of the stable and a yeoman of the avery, besides at least fourteen grooms and eight pages. John Charteris, probably of Cuthilgurdy, and Arthur Sinclair, perhaps a brother of Sir William Sinclair of Roslin, had charge of the "great horse" or war chargers which had been imported from Denmark: they had eight grooms under them. There was a "sumpterman" who looked after the mules, of the name of Bane, while Tempelman gets the same appellation and probably had charge of the draught horses. The Queen's geldings were under the care of William Gibb, and there were at least two smiths, John Sprotty, who had been in the Royal service for many years, and his son Thomas. Patrick Slater was master saddler, and a lorimer supplied the necessary bits and stirrups, and there were several armourers, including a Frenchman, who saw to the King's weapons and steel harness.

A Keeper of the King's Harriers is mentioned, besides four dog-keepers, and no doubt there were other hangers-on in the kennel department; and there were at least five falconers.

In addition to the above there are sundry other persons mentioned by name in the Accounts to whom liveries were given and sometimes pensions paid, but whose duties and position in the Household are not indicated. It may be noted that many of the persons mentioned in these Accounts appear in the Exchequer Rolls in connection with the outlay of the Comptroller, by whom no doubt their actual wages were paid.

From what has been said above it will be seen that the yearly expense of the King's Household must have been very considerable; and it must be taken into consideration that only part of the outlays is included in these Accounts. The cost of provisions, wine, beer, and forage for the horses was not accounted for by the Treasurer, and must have amounted to a very large sum. The actual money payment in wages may not have been very much, but the frequent gifts of clothing, some of it of a very handsome kind, were in themselves an item of no small importance. Taking a general view of the whole expenditure in regard to the Household, it may be gathered that the Court of the Scottish King in the middle of the sixteenth century, though perhaps not so large as that of many other European sovereigns, was as suitably equipped and administered, if the condition, size, and the resources of the country in which it was are kept in view. The King of Scotland did not pretend, and could not afford, to be a patron of art or a builder of palaces like Francis I.; his quarters at Stirling and even at Holyrood cannot have been very spacious, but in Linlithgow he had a residence which could hold its own in comparison with that of many a wealthier monarch. Apart from her mere desire to please, there must have been some truth in the assertion of Mary of Lorraine that "she had never seen a more princely palace," and Sir David Lindsay, who had opportunities of making comparisons between it and the royal residences on the Continent, calls it a "palyce of plesance" which "mycht be ane pattern in Portugall or France."

Having alluded to the number of the officers and servants in the King's Household, it may not be uninteresting to glance briefly at the way in which they were drest and the appearance they would present to the townsfolk of the cities in which they dwelt. Some idea of this may be gained from the entries for liveries and clothing, with which so much of the Accounts is taken up, though it has been found necessary, from considerations of space to omit many details on the subject in the following pages. But even when the particulars of the clothing are absent we can get some idea of the relative magnificence of the different servants from the sums of money granted them for clothing. Thus the superior officers each got £20 for his clothing; these included the masters of the household, the cup-bearers, the carvers, the ushers, the master cook, the master of the silver plate, the master of the horse, or, as he was termed, "squire of the Kings stable," and the yeoman of the wine-cellar. The next grade got £13 6s., 8d., and included the inferior ushers, the yeomen of the King's chamber, of the wardrobe, of the larder, spice-house, pantry, and stable, the elimosinar, steward, smith, sumpterman, and some others. £10 was the allowance for the grooms of the cellar, larder, spice-house, kitchen, the pastry-cook, and others; some servants of lower grade got £5: while even the turnspits in the kitchen got an allowance of twenty-six shillings and eightpence each. The King's liveries were, strictly speaking, his heraldic colours, red and yellow: all the grooms in the stable were so appalled: they had parti-coloured coats of "dymmegrane," a kind of red cloth, and an equal amount of yellow, with hose of French grey, and probably red bonnets. Many of the other servants had similar parti-coloured liveries: a juggler who came to the Court in 1539 had such a coat, with the addition of a red and yellow satin doublet, and hose of the same colours. Serat, the Queen's female jester, had a red and yellow gown, with a green satin kirtle. Jane, the French female dwarf, was, on the other hand, bedecked in a light blue purple gown of velvet, with a kirtle lined with green. Not all the servants were drest in parti-coloured livery. The pages had cloaks and hose entirely of red, with black coats: other persons had clothing of "colour de roy," which is supposed to have been a bright tawny colour; some, like the Queen's stablemen, were clad in brown and red, with black bonnets, while others, and especially those of a better class, were arrayed in rich black. Jacques Habet, a French "tapischer," got for his marriage a black cloak and a satin doublet of the same funereal colour, a most inappropriate equipment, to our eyes, for a wedding.

The officers of the Household and upper servants do not seem to have worn the ordinary yellow and red liveries. Indeed the latter seem to have been looked on then, as now, as rather a mark of inferiority. Anthony, for instance, an old and valued musician of the Court, positively refused, in 1538, to wear the red and yellow any longer, and wished to be differentiated from his underlings. The matter was accordingly arranged by a payment to him of £9 17s., and he then provided his own clothes and was practically "out of livery." It is difficult to say where the line was drawn, as we find persons like the master carpenter and a yeoman of the Queen's kitchen, neither of them very exalted offices, getting liveries entirely of black silk or stuff. The higher officers generally wore velvet.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Though the present volume of Accounts does not contain, as some of its predecessors did, the details of any outstanding historical event, the student of contemporary life and manners will find much to interest him, and a few of the more important items may be indicated.

Robert Forman of Luthrie, afterwards Lyon, entered on his heraldic career in March 1540, when he got a gift of £10 to buy "ane coit armour." A few months later he was made Ross Herald, and had a gift of £23 to buy clothes on his being appointed on an embassy to the Emperor along with Sir John Campbell of Lundy. He did not become Lyon till the death of Sir David Lindsay in 1555.

There are some curious particulars regarding the working of gold at Crawford Muir. The mine had been worked at all events since 1511, when it was under the superintendence of Sir James Pettigrew and the "maister finour," Sibald Northtberge. After the marriage of James V. to Mary of Lorraine his wife's parents seem to have become interested in it, and in July 1539 two French miners arrived at St. Andrews, sent by the “quenys grace fader,” and were immediately conveyed to Edinburgh to be interviewed by the King. At the same time the Duke of Guise seems to have sent to his son-in-law six masons, a much more important service to Scotland, coming as they did from a land where the architecture of the Renaissance was having such a powerful influence under the fostering care of Francis I., and where many splendid buildings, some of which stand to this day, were being erected. The miners arrived; they were sent to the mine at Crawford Muir, together with an Englishman whose name is not given but for whom James had sent “to vesy the mynd.” The foreigners were naturally rather at a loss in a strange and, no doubt to them, rather an uncouth land: “ane Scottis boy that spekis Frenche” was accordingly sent with them “to serve them quhill thai gett the langage.” What they actually did at the mine is not recorded, but after going there they returned to Edinburgh, probably to make a report, and then went back to the mine again. Their expenses up to the 17th of August after their arrival, including the making of “werk-lumeys” for them, amounted to £15 11s., and the money expended on them for the next month came to almost exactly the same sum. Their interpreter got fifty shillings for a service of two months and eight days: it is doubtful if they ever succeeded in “getting the langage,” as their stay was but short. On the 9th of October they took their departure for France, being dismissed with the handsome gratuity of £80. No doubt when they got back to sunny Lorraine they had many a tale to tell of their adventures in the far north in the summer of 1539. Whatever they did with the mine it is certain that gold was got out of it, as there are many entries of "gold of the mynd" being given to the Court goldsmith to manufacture into ornaments. John Mossman was an artificer of renown and of much resource, as he was continually converting ornaments of which the King had tired into other articles. In 1538 he made a great basin of gold of over ten pounds weight: he also manufactured a ship, probably a dinner-table ornament, out of two bracelets, though it is likely that this was "ekit" with "gold of his awin." In the following year, besides making some rings and other small articles of jewellery, he produced a silver case for the King's shaving utensils, and a great silver "stoup" for "inbringing of the Kings collation." The latter weighed no less than 195 $\frac{3}{4}$ ounces; Mossman got £19 11s. 6d. for the workmanship, the silver itself being evidently supplied by the King. Silver at that time was 15s. 4d. the ounce, so the cost of the material must have come to the large sum of £1491, truly a noble "stoup." He also made at this time a silver whistle with a long chain, which was given by the King to the "patroun of the schippis," or, in other words, the admiral. In January 1539-40 Mossman made for the Queen, from "gold of the mynde," a belt weighing $19\frac{1}{2}$ ounces, in which was set a sapphire stone: this cost £20. He had an account in 1540 of £410 for general gold work in the shape of chains, rings, bracelets, &c., executed by him. In July of that year he received a lot of gold ornaments which were part of the escheated estate of William Home, which were all melted down into one large ingot weighing $28\frac{1}{2}$ ounces, the ounce of gold being valued at £8 10s. Out of this ingot was made shortly after a large chain of gold, enamelled black: it may be mentioned, that, besides the ordinary ounce of gold, there was another system of weighing gold by "unicorns" (a coin of about 18s. value). Gold of two unicorn weight seems to have been valued at £6 8s.

Some of the most interesting items in the present volume are those relating to the Royal crown, which, it seems, was almost entirely remade by order of the King. The whole subject has been treated in great detail in an interesting and able account of the Scottish Regalia by Mr. Alexander J. S. Brook,¹ so that it is only necessary to refer to it very briefly here. On 15th January 1539-40 John Mossman got a payment of £30 for "making and fassoun of the Kings croune, weyand iii. pund wecht x. unces, and thairof of gold of the mynde xli. unce quarter unce." At the same time he got £19 6s. for providing three great garnets, one great emerald, and nineteen other stones to the crown. This was, of course, in addition to the stones which were already there; these we know, from an inventory of 1539, to have consisted of twenty diamonds and sixty-eight orient pearls. The gold used in this remaking of the crown came entirely from the Crawford Muir mine: this is specifically stated in another entry in the Accounts of 1542 not included in the present volume.

The crown had a bonnet of purple velvet and a lining of satin of the same colour: thirty-four shillings were paid to John Paterson for a case for it, and it was delivered into the King's hands at Holyrood on the 8th of February 1539-40. The sceptre of silver, a beautiful piece of Italian workmanship, had been originally presented to James IV. by Pope Alexander VI. in 1494, but had been added to by James V.—who had a perfect craze for remaking and altering metal work—in 1536. So it was quite ready for the coronation, and remains to this day a beautiful specimen of the silversmith's art, though not improved by the less skilful treatment it underwent at the hands of British workmen.

So far the King's regalia were in order, but the Queen had also to be thought of. An entirely new crown was prepared for her, as may be seen from a payment to Mossman on 5th October 1539 of £45 for "making of the Queins croune and furnesing of stanis thairto, quhilk weyit xxxv. unce of gold of mynde." She had also a sceptre of silver gilt, which weighed $31\frac{1}{2}$ ounces, but this, together with her crown, has now disappeared. The coronation of the Queen took place at Holyrood on 22nd February 1539-40, but few details, except the summoning of the Peeresses and the entertainment of eleven chaplains of the Chapel Royal who were present, appear in the Accounts.

John Mossman was not the only goldsmith employed by the Court. Thomas Rynd, an artificer in St. Andrews, supplied a good many articles to the King in 1539: chief among them a round belt, enamelled with white letters, which cost £32. The entry would have been more interesting had the clerk had condescended to detail and informed us what the letters were which were enamelled on this belt. Rynd also furnished some ladies' ornaments, which were intended for New Year's presents, both in 1538 and 1540. There is also a John Kyll mentioned as having provided similar articles in the former year. All this points to the fact that during the reign of James V. the goldsmith's art was by no means neglected in Scotland, and that those who practised it had attained considerable proficiency in their vocation, though the author of the paper on the regalia above mentioned does not seem to think that their work was equal to that of the English or foreign workmen.

Sport naturally is alluded to pretty freely in the Accounts, though not perhaps so frequently as in some former volumes. The reality of the life of which these pages are a reflection is pleasantly brought home to us when we read that one of the King's dogs was called "Begsche"—surely rather an awkward name for a dog—and that he was sick and was cured by a "leiche" or veterinary surgeon of the name of John Campbell. What breed of dogs was kept is not specifically shown, but the "rache cuppillis" more than once mentioned prove them to have been dogs of chase, not improbably including some boarhounds, as there was an importation of "sangweleris" or wild boars from France, which were turned down in the woods of Falkland. But there were other animals about the Court not so much useful as ornamental: we read of a popingo or popinjay, which was most likely a parrot, and Thomas Melville's wife in Falkland got a gown and kirtle of fine French black for the keeping and nursing of certain "pets" of the King.

Not the least important parts of this volume are those devoted to "munitions," to the making of artillery, and the fitting up accommodation for it in the Castle of Edinburgh. It is impossible, within the limits of a preface like the present, to enter into details concerning the manufacture of heavy ordnance, which went on busily during the period under review: indeed to do so would require greater technical skill than the present writer possesses; but it is to be hoped that some day the whole subject may be taken up in the light of the whole series of Treasurer's Accounts by some one who is qualified to deal with it. As regards the building it may be pointed out that the stone employed was got from the quarry at Ravelstone.
